

MEET PROGRAM MENTOR JAMES LEIGO

James Leigo has a passion for the Western Division and is an advocate for change management.

James runs a livestock partnership with his wife Danielle and father David on Dungarvan Station, located 160km north west of Bourke.

As a land manager who has already invested in change management, James knows first hand the difficulties associated with the process and wants to help like-minded landholders to ensure their land remains productive and has the ability to regenerate.

"It can be very difficult to initiate change.... I believe I can help land managers to stay motivated and work towards achieving their goals," James said.

James has first hand experience in the hardships facing today's farming families.

"One of the most difficult things for all land managers is staying motivated, especially during periods of adversity," he said.

"I really enjoy working in the Western Division and believe it is some of the most productive and diverse land in the country."

James joined the Resilient Landscapes Project - Mentoring Program to help other land managers stay motivated and work towards achieving their goals.

"With my experience I can act as a sounding board and can assist land managers when making those key decisions that impact their enterprise," he said.
